

The Purpose of Chaos

For chaos to exist within the perfection of the Infinite's Being, it must have a purpose. For eons of existence, the sons and daughters of light have known very little about chaos, not even understanding it when seen mirrored by those who have embodied it. After all, one can only understand what is within oneself.

Until the purpose of life changed in August 2006 (explained in The Ring of Truth) when a pole reversal occurred within the macrocosm, chaos was seen as a growth mechanism. The purpose of life up to that point had been to comprehend certain portions of existence by turning the unknown into the known through experience.

If chaos is defined as the unidentified portions of existence that cannot be determined as to whether they reflect the Infinite's perfection, then August 2006 should have been a dramatic turning point. At that juncture, all within existence had been identified as to whether it was or was not life-enhancing.

If chaos is defined as the perpetrating of obsolete patterns, the cosmic ascension that has been in full effect since February 2005 should have brought a dramatic lessening of chaos. Within the etheric realms the cosmic ascension's effects have been profound. In material life, chaotic conditions still seem to continue.

Thus, if chaos is no longer there to signal us when the mystery of beingness waits to be solved, and the dissolution of obsolete patterns has not brought an end to it, what then explained it? Although there has been a lessening of chaos due to these two factors, the results are not so visible in what has changed, but rather in what has not happened; the large scale catastrophes long predicted that have not occurred.

The core of the problem of not seeing the desired degree of diminished chaos lies in our not properly understanding what chaos is. To explain the role chaos has played within the large picture of cosmic growth, it is necessary for us to comprehend how cosmic growth takes place.

The Dynamics of Cosmic Growth

1. Certain building blocks of existence hold the large template, or pattern, of life in place.
2. Within this pattern (think of it as the ideal), individual beings have a certain amount of freedom of expression. They will choose to work with the pattern or against it. They will, or will not, cooperate with the highest good.
3. Two scenarios can shift the overall template: Firstly, if enough beings cooperate with the larger pattern (the will of the Infinite), they can bring its full potential into actuality by contributing their rich and diverse interpretation of that will.
4. Not only can we evolve life by finding new ways in which to express its perfection, but the Infinite can do so as well. This occurs by the Infinite exploring Itself within that specific pattern of perspective. When enough self-perception takes place, the Infinite's pattern of expression (the template) transfigures to a higher version.

5. The large will of the Infinite is the highest order of existence in the cosmos at any given time. Our lives as we strive to bring them into alignment with the big picture, are of a lower order.

6. Because the minute we catch up to some extent with the perfection of the large pattern and cause it to transfigure to a higher one yet again, the gap remains.

At this point our definition of chaos needs to change to reflect the actual process of cosmic growth. Chaos is indeed part of the Infinite's perfection when we realize it is a higher order seen from the perspective of a lower order. A higher order's perspective sees the perfection of the divine pattern, while the lower order sees it as chaos. The caterpillar, not yet able to see the beauty of the butterfly into which it will transfigure, finds his metamorphosis catastrophic and chaotic.

Are we then doomed always to live in chaos because this gap will always exist? Behind the face value, the appearances of life, the pattern can be seen. It takes constant vigilance on our part to cultivate this external perspective, to see the perfection of what sages have called the 'real' behind the chaotic appearances.

The template is the structure of life, the bends in the river. The torrent of personal choices lived within its confines is the flow. Neither is less perfect than the other and each has its place.

NOTE: On June 24, 2008 the laws of reality were changed in the Book of Life to reflect the following:

- The gap between the higher order of the template and the lower order of the collective expression of the beings of the cosmos shall be reduced to 1%.
- The remaining 1% shall change at a rate that produces a comfortable and well-rooted pace of growth. It shall act as a timing mechanism that provides just enough opportunity for the emerging butterfly to gain the strength to soar.
